For the second iteration of my new prototype, I changed the design so that the user is only presented with an option to log in or navigate to a different page to sign up as opposed to being able to log in and sign up all on one page. The decision to progressively disclose the sign up page was influenced by the realization that more information might be required for the sign up process than just the user's name, email, and password, such as a phone number, location preferences, etc. In that case, there would be too many input fields to include in the sign up box on the account page, causing cluttering and an overwhelming amount of content.
